“ My daughter, Kasha and I just saw this. First off sad to mention her as a grandchild when Nancy or anyone in the family has never made an effort to get to know her, contact her etc!! Also MY 2 granddaughters are Ailani and Mila!! Who noone has ever met or tried to!! Clearly since their names were spelt wrong! Sad! You are only family when you are involved!!! Consistent and present!!

It's easy to throw stones at someone who is not able to defend herself. Nancy was my friend, and I know how deeply grieved she was that she was not permitted to have a relationship with ALL her grandchildren. This was due to the fact that some adults never grow up and realize that when they steal from their children the wonderful privilege to know, love, and appreciate their grandparents those kids are the biggest losers. Those parents should hang their heads in shame for breaking the hearts of their children by destroying such a huge part of their life and their heritage. That is the collateral damage that divorce can bring, but it doesn't HAVE to be that way. Don't blame the Grandmas, blame the selfish, self-serving, grudge-holding parents.

I knew Nancy for many years and was blessed to be her friend. She deeply loved God and her family, ALL of them. Even though she was not allowed to have a close relationship with all her grandchildren, which was NEVER her doing, she loved them all and grieved over the loss of that family relationship. Her deepest desire was to cook big dinners for the whole family, surrounded by her loved ones and serving them with the love only a mom and grandma can. It's very sad that her dream was never realized. I'm very familiar with that pain because it has been my own family experience. So many times the Mom/Grandma is blamed and shoved to the background, through no fault of her own. But when it is not your nature to bulldoze your way in and demand attention from others, you become sort of a shadow that is sometimes merely tolerated. Nancy and I cried together many times over our similar tragedies, but confrontation was not her style, nor mine. We both just kept hoping and praying that things would change, but they didn't. I know this wonderful, complicated, fun loving, sometimes goofy, artistic lady is now enjoying Heaven and all its rewards and fulfillment. I love her and miss her. Many times I think, "I need to call Nancy and talk to her"; then I remember, too late. But she's happy now, completely.
