“ He was one of the good guys last of a dying breed. I met him when I was 24 yrs old tending bar at the SoHo cafe in the 90s. He lived next door. We became good friends. He got divorced and moved to Hartford but we remained friends. He was the first to teach me how to ride a motorcycle. He let me practice on his “old” honda. He would have me go around the blocks in Hartford and then up and down rt 3 and then we would go have a beer somewhere. Last time I talked to him he was getting married and invited me and my husband to his after wedding party. I think it was camping or floating its been awhile now so i don't remember. Time flew by and I unfortunately lost track of my friend. It breaks my heart that I will never see him again. Life got busy and we lost track of each other. My sympathies and respect to his wife snd family. The world lost another good man

“ I've known Randy my entire life. He was smart, kind, and would speak the truths others wouldn't say. I told my family there was a huge blonde - probably gruff - guy who would come after my dad died. And he did. My sincere condolences to his family on his loss. He was a gentle giant to a small girl.
